

“Scholarships are a blessing to me. If I didn’t have them, I wouldn’t be at college. Scholarship donors give to students who want to be successful, but don’t necessarily have the money to do so,” said Caitlyn Curry. “When I found out that I received scholarships, I was very thankful and happy. I knew if I didn’t receive scholarships, I would have to take out loans or ask my parents for financial help.”

The Delbarton, West Virginia, native is majoring in accounting and will graduate in May of 2022. Upon graduation, she intends to become an accountant or forensic accountant. She chose to attend Marshall because of its size and because it felt homey and safe. Caitlyn is looking forward to learning how to excel as an accountant and credits the professors as one of the best parts of Marshall. She enjoys the campus, the sense of family and the many opportunities offered at Marshall.

“My greatest challenge as a college student has been reading for classes, because I have a reading comprehension problem,” explained Caitlyn.

Encouraging alumni to give back to help students follow in their successful footsteps, Caitlyn acknowledges those who have helped her throughout her life.

“I’m most thankful for my parents and teachers throughout school for pushing me to be a better person and student.”
